

Aziel Philippos Goulandris

After a bachelor and a master's degree of law in Bordeaux, France, as well as a Master's in Political Science, I pursued my studies at King's College London where I obtained an MA of Geopolitics, Territory and Security. My professional experience before my current employment includes working as a legal translator (Greek-French) as well as numerous internships one of which took place at the International Relations division of the French Senate. From the beginning of this year, I am employed as a commissioned officer of the French Navy, in order to work for the Maritime Prefecture in Cherbourg, which is in charge of the maritime surveillance in the Channel and North Sea areas off the French coast (the French administrative organisation does not provide for a proper coast guard agency but rather entrusts a mission of coordination to a maritime prefecture). My position is assistant head of the "law enforcement office" of the prefecture. Additionally I am in charge of conducting a survey on the role of the French navy in matters of public order.